Protect Your Environment with These ETFs

Global warming is now a blazing issue, raising panic alarms from pole to pole. The louder the grumble of panic is, the more human awareness toward protecting the environment awakens. Probably this is why a single day has been designated to commemorate the worth of environment protection. The day, touted as 'World Environment Day,' has been celebrated for the last 43 years on June 5.

This might sound as a social alert, but the investing world also gives kind attention to it. One can have a fair understanding of this intention looking at different areas of the ETF industry. There are clean energy ETFs, low carbon ETFs and even environment-oriented ETFs at investors' disposal. There are plenty of stock options as well, though ETFs are seemingly better choices as its basket approach minimizes security-specific risks.

. . . .

Clean Energy ETFs

It would be imprudent if we do not discuss clean energy ETFs today, especially given its recent boom. While a moderate recovery in the oil price helped the clean stocks to some extent, Barrack Obama's 'Climate Change Action Plan' was instrumental in driving up the sector from last year's lows

While most clean ETFs including ... PowerShares Global Clean Energy Portfolio (PBD), ...